Form 990, Part III, Line 4a:

HUMAN RIGHTS The project has involved work overseas in areas of severe repression involving the collection and distribution of human rights information, encouraging peaceful political solutions to violent conflicts, and facilitating local community work on issues of poverty, security and justice. The Human Rights and Justice Project operates a free, web-based clearinghouse, updated throughout the day, on political, social and economic developments overseas that may be of interest to academic journalists, activists and the general public. Materials circulated include scholarly official and NGO studies, foreign press reports and translations of pertinent foreign-language materials. Major topics include political change, health, the environment, popular movements, and economic trends.

Form 990, Part III, Line 4b:

INVENTIVE INITIATIVES Essential Information has started more than a dozen projects in recent years and is determined to keep starting more. Rather than get hung up on traditional issues categories, the Organization's only criteria is: Does it promote innovation in the public interest? With quiet determination and sophistication, project leaders identify the fulcrums of power that invariably lie in the shadows, envision new pathways of change that entrenched organizations, consider too far out, and develop new strategic political strategies that, over time, profoundly alter the terms of the debate for a given issue. Essential Information projects are designed to be flexible and evolutionary as circumstances warrant. We expand successful initiatives and discontinue less successful ones. The ascent is on experimentation to develop effective new models of citizen action. In addition, this project has funded dozens of articles on critical issues -- ranging from worker exposure to deadly gases to illegal U.S. efforts to supply the repressive Guatemalan military -- that have been overlooked or neglected by the mass media.
